

Online tutoring portal blacksacademy.net announces a method for students with learning difficulties

Black's Academy is looking for students with dyslexia, dyscalculia or learning difficulties to participate in a study, which is running over the summer vacation, showcasing the encouraging results they can produce. There are free places available.

Launched in 2020

blacksacademy.net is the brainchild of director Peter Fekete, who is an academic with a long history in education. The online portal is an extensive database of educational material used by Black's Academy tutors. The company is now looking for students with dyslexia, dyscalculia or learning difficulties to participate in a study showcasing the encouraging results they can produce.

"Dyslexia and dyscalculia affect about 12 per cent of the population and can have severe effects on a person's education if not taken proper care of," says Peter Fekete. "However when detected early on and given extra attention, a learning difficulty is by no means anything that will hold back or affect your future education," he concludes. "Blacksacademy.net is already producing outstanding improvements in students of all abilities. We aim to eliminate learning difficulties for the bulk of students, facilitating inclusivity, as well as catering to the extra needs of all, including the very gifted."

"Black's Academy offers private tutoring in mathematics, English and science, helping students improve beyond expectations. "The problem of inclusion is an increasing reason for students with any learning difficulty to drop out of the system. We at Black's Academy will assess the students, find out where and when they started struggling, then starting again, if you like, we create the foundations of education," says Fekete. "Every student is taken as an individual and given undivided attention. We want to showcase that when the foundations are solid, any student can succeed. It is crucial we find out where it started to crumble." He concludes, "I myself am a great example of someone who has dyslexia and that has not stopped me from getting several degrees and having a career in education."

Free places on the study are still available.

This is a really great opportunity for students with any form of learning difficulty to get help and most of all be noticed and cared for. We want to raise awareness of learning difficulties and how they need not get in the way of a bright future in education.

Parents who are interested in enlisting their children in the study are required to accept our end-user agreement together with all our data and child-protection safeguards. The study comprises twenty hours of free one-to-one, online tuition. All our tutors, who are undergraduates of prestigious universities, are fully trained and DBS enhanced checked.

There are free places available for this study, which we are running over the summer vacation.
